Executive Summary of The State of Freedom of Expression in the Americas

In the report, The State of Freedom of Expression in the Americas, The Center for Studies on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information (CELE)\(^1\) classifies and analyzes the violations of freedom of expression reported by the Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression from 1998-2008 in order to analyze the state of freedom of expression in the Americas and to gain insight into patterns of violation of this right.\(^2\) This report includes a description of CELE’s methodologies as well as its analysis.

The report is not intended to be an exhaustive analysis of the state of the freedom of expression in the Americas. Instead it is intended to analyze, in a quantitative way, violations of this right as reported by the Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression. CELE’s analysis of these cases highlighted certain patterns and opportunities for reforms to the system the Special Rapporteur uses to report these violations.

CELE created seventeen categories of violations of freedom of expression. These categories include obvious characterizations such as murders and physical threats and also more subjective categories such as abuse of public power, threats to the diversity of the press and preemptive censorship. CELE classified all the instances of violations of the freedom of expression reported in the annual reports of the Special Rapporteur from 1998-2008 into one of these categories. CELE then used these statistics to create graphs documenting the overall number of cases in each category, the number of violations in each category that were reported in each year from 1998-2008, the number of violations and instances of progress made reported per country in 32 countries from 1998-2008, and the violations of freedom of expression from 1998-2008 by category in 24 countries.

\(^1\) The Center for Studies on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information (CELE) was founded in 2009 at the Palermo University Law School with the objective to provide rigorous investigations and studies to sectors of civil society, journalists, government institutions and the academic community that are dedicated to the promotion of those rights, primarily in Latin America. CELE was created in response to a need to construct spaces for debate and study dedicated to reflecting on the importance and limits of freedom of expression and access to information in the region. In order to accomplish this, the center proposes to create dialogue and collaborate with other academic entities in Argentina and in Latin America.

\(^2\) The Regional Alliance for the Freedom of Expression and Access to Information, a coalition of 23 organizations that promote these rights, requested that Eduardo Bertoni, the director of the Center for Studies on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information (CELE) undertake this research. Elizabeth Compa, a Yale Law School student, Maria Noel Ferrer a student at the University of Buenos Aires Law School and Alyssa Broidy, a recent graduate of Amherst College assisted with the collection of information and writing rough drafts of some of the sections. All three were research assistants at CELE during 2009. The complete version of the report in Spanish can be found on CELE’s website at www.palermo.edu/cele
The following are several conclusions that CELE reached from an analysis of these graphs:

- While judicial penal actions continue to constitute significant violations of freedom of expression, “desacato” cases, cases in which the defendant is accused of having defamed a public official or institution, have declined. This decline is perhaps because of the Organization of American States’ (OAS) opposition to “desacato” cases, which has been notable since 1994 when the OAS published its Report on Compatibility of “Desacato” Laws and the American Convention on Human Rights.

- The majority of the threats to freedom of expression reported by the Special Rapporteur appear to be violent in nature. In the four countries with the most reported violations (Colombia, Peru, Mexico and Venezuela), violent violations constitute over 50% of the total violations.

- The number of violations contained in the categories censorship, abusive use of public power and preemptive censorship could indicate that intolerance of public officials to criticism is a factor that contributes to violations of freedom of expression.

CELE also concluded that there are a number of challenges associated with establishing a ranking of countries based on the state of freedom of expression or identifying with certainty whether the situation has improved or declined over time in specific countries using the data on violations of freedom of expression presenting in the Special Rapporteur’s annual reports.

One of the challenges arises from uneven reporting between countries. Violations of freedom of expression are reported to the Special Rapporteur by governmental agencies and members of civil society such as journalists and NGOs. The relative difference in strength of civil societies between countries could account for more violations being reported for countries that actually have better protections for freedom of expression than countries with more violations but less of a political culture that encourages reporting these violations. The fact that several countries in the Caribbean such as Surinam and the Barbados have an extremely small number of violations of freedom of expression according to the annual report does not necessarily mean that freedom of expression is more protected there than in other countries that have far more violations. CELE’s statistics are also not adjusted to account for population size. Similarly, it can be difficult to measure a country’s progress over time using these statistics since these factors can also change within countries over time.
Another challenge stems from the likelihood that the way the Special Rapporteurs have been collecting, verifying and selecting information has not been entirely uniform. Some of the violations reported in the annual reports have not been reported by organizations or individuals within the countries where the violations took place, but were obtained by the Special Rapporteur on visits to countries. Since the Special Rapporteur changes, each new Rapporteur may choose different countries to visit and verify violations in different ways. For example, in its annual report in 2007, the Office of the Special Rapporteur, “took into account all the allegations and information regarding the state of freedom of expression that it received...In previous reports, events that were representative of the situation in each country had been listed and then grouped according to the principles that were being violated.” This change in the previous system of reporting led to a large spike in the number of cases included in the annual report. To add another variable to the mix, in the rest of the annual reports the Special Rapporteur does not include every violation that it has verified and it is left to each Special Rapporteur to determine the criteria for deciding whether the violation will be included in the report.

The report also emphasized that the information on the state of freedom of expression contained in the Special Rapporteur’s reports is extremely valuable. CELE chose to study the Special Rapporteur’s reports as opposed to those of any other influential NGO because the Office of the Special Rapporteur is part of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, an overarching commission that the states themselves have invested with regulatory authority. Since it is independent from NGOs and from the states, it occupies a uniquely independent position and is ideally situated to undertake the essential task of monitoring the state of freedom of expression in the region.

It is because this task is so fundamentally important that CELE encourages NGOs, which can provide valuable assistance to the Special Rapporteur, to develop more reliable and rigorous monitoring mechanisms in order to increase the amount and quality of information that comes to the Special Rapporteur. CELE also believes that the Special Rapporteur’s work would be furthered by the development of more homogenous, consistent mechanisms to determine which cases are included in annual reports and how to verify them.

CELE hopes that this report will not only support the work of the Special Rapporteur but also reinforce the fundamental roles that civil society and the states play in the fulfillment of the office’s task of monitoring the state of freedom of expression in the Americas.